About this newsletter:

Its purpose is to improve the communication between the members of the Co-op to be the bloodstream of vital information, the generation of ideas and projects, and a forum for discussions about the Co-op's future and direction.

The newsletter is open to contributions from everybody, whether ideas, info, discussions, photos, drawings etc.

The opinions that are expressed are the writers own and not the Co-op's.

Next newsletter will come out in July. Deadline for contributions: June 30th.

If you would like to put your energy into this newsletter and make it better then contact Grete Westyle or Louise Andreas via the Co-op.

What sort of space and priority should skill sharing and training have at the Co-op? Is it possible to keep the profile of innovative and critical filmmaking while teaching basic skills? What do you think?

Some background information on the courses from Orlagh Mulcaghy.

I thought I would give you a little background information on how and why the LFMC youngest department came into being.

Over the years a number of initiatives were taken to encourage new members by offering them tuition on the Co-op's equipment. Shanaz Husain was instrumental in developing this idea and volunteered a great deal of time and effort to the project as did Almoor Dewali when he took it over.

By 1990 it was believed necessary to develop a formal structure through which the LFMC could offer its members access to new techniques and equipment. The reasons were as follows:

During 1989/90 the workshop had a very large increase in membership. Many of these members came with a great deal of enthusiasm but with very little technical skill. This presented the workshop with a dilemma.

The workshop equipment was old and showing its wear, the funding climate gloomy and the likelihood of getting capital grant funding to replace equipment unlikely. Inexperienced hires are hard on equipment, so the rate of repair and renewal were increasing dramatically. Effectively it meant that more people were placing greater demands on less equipment, surely a recipe for disaster.

The LFMC is an Open Access organisation to encourage and promote innovative use of film. The workshop did not want to stifle the enthusiasm of new members by restricting the hire of equipment and thereby falling in the aims and objectives of the Co-op.

Some of the funding for workshop staffing had been withdrawn (LBGS) so there would be no extra workshop staff to offer help to the membership on a one to one basis as in times gone by.

After a few pick-ups the idea of offering formal tuition at the LFMC on an on-going basis was deemed necessary if the new membership was to have an equal opportunity to explore the LFMC's facilities.

In February 1990 I was asked if I could make the courses work on a self financing basis. I took up the challenge, working on the basis that the courses had to make money to cover the running costs, equipment film hire, office facility wages including my own; if I did not make money I would not get paid.

Workshop report

The bad news:

The two Manfrotto tripods are still being repaired.

Nagra 3 has been broken; it was dropped while on location. Please take care of the equipment!!!!

The good news:

A substantial sum of money has been donated for the maintenance and purchase of equipment. Thanks.

The Optical Printer has got a new Bolex SBM camera with a 400 ft magazine. It is in excellent working condition.

ZDF Television has donated a 1/2 studio tape edit deck which has a 18fps facility.

There is now a new budget for this year's purchases and repairs. Do you have any suggestions for equipment that would improve the Co-op's standard? Possibilities that are being looked at at the moment are a Tracking Dolly and a Digital Lightmeter.

Film stock for sale from the Co-op

Fujifilm 8521, 16mm colour negative film, daylight spoool, 10.00 per 100 ft roll. Just past sell by date but it has been checked and has good definition and colour rendition.

Eastman 7239, Colour 16mm, 100 ft daylight spoools, 5.00

Ilford RX, black and white 16mm, 400ft rolls, recording film. Necessary to test. Price negotiable.
Film and Video in South Africa
April 91

Television was only introduced in South Africa as recently as 1976. Video followed a few years later. South African friends of my generation remember regular home movie shows projected on 88 or 16mm. Consequently I imagined that South African 2nd hand and pawn shops would be crammed with old movie making equipment. I did find an abundance of Super 8 gear; it was available in modern photographic shops, selling off old stock at comparatively cheap rates, as well as in 2nd hand shops.

Yet there seems to be very little low budget experimental film practice. Film is seen as the domain of the rich - leave it to Richard Attenborough - and video is considered to be more accessible for the majority of people. While community video equipment hire workshops do exist, public transport is poor so people have no physical access to these centres, and neither television, let alone video are a commonplace feature in most South African homes. It is easy though to see why reservations about film exist. Super 8 film can be bought in South Africa, it costs about 10 a roll, the same as here, but the average wage is less than U.K. supplementary benefit, and the film can't be processed in South Africa. As for 16mm, Agfa supply colour stock but no b & w. Kodak pulled out of South Africa. There is only one processing lab which is Government subsided, so the lab can censor if it pleases......

I remained convinced that if some energy was channelled into researching possibilities for low budget film, this could become a more accessible tool of expression than video. I attempted to hunt down some b & w stock and a Russian Tank or some other means of hand processing. I was interested to see what was available in the way of found footage, leader, etc. I had success with the latter. There are several video rental shops which also hire out 16mm movies - most of them mainstream. At 'Cine Place' a bloke who worked there told me that he would give me a bag of old found footage for a couple of quid. I asked him where he got leader - he makes it himself by cleaning the emulsion off the celluloid. 16mm and 88 projectors were available for hire for less than a fiver a night. At least enough to run a found footage workshop.

I visited the Young Film-makers School hoping to find out more about availability of b & w stock and alternative processing methods, but I was put off by the exclusive look and feel of the school, the glossy posters advertising expensive films and the man outside waiting for his son to finish school who told me that South Africa was a good country for film-making because the sun was always shining. Film was not part of the curriculum at Cape Town Art School; students there told me it was too expensive.

I had a chance meeting with 'Neil' who was the assistant director of Mapantsula. He asked me if I'd seen the film and did I remember his name from the titles - not what I thought of the film.

I was directed to Community Video Education Trust in Cape Town. For 7 years CVET has been involved in the acquisition, production and distribution of video for community organisations and Trade Unions around Cape Town with the philosophy of using video as an educational and organisational tool against apartheid. Funded largely by Canadian anti-apartheid organisations, a source which is currently drying up, the workers at CVET have mixed feelings about the future of the organisation. Most people who use CVET tend to see video as an afterthought - as a visual record of a conference or demonstration. CVET are asked to record the events and are left at the end with an armful of videos and the organisers have no idea of how they want it edited. Now CVET are insisting that all users of the organisation arrange beforehand with CVET staff a clear idea of exactly what they require.

Although CVET has current funding problems, they have drawn up a very clear outline of their future direction and areas in need of financial assistance.

I was told that there used to be a flourishing underground film movement in South Africa. Even though many films were banned for blocks in South Africa, several illicit movie houses existed. That was before the Group Areas Act (when blacks were forcibly uprooted from their homes and moved to remote areas, consequently destroying whole communities and cultures).

Staff at CVET are interested in the model of the LFMC and are keen to keep up links, as are Film and Allied Workers Organisation and the Free Film-makers Co-op. I heard about these two organisations towards the end of my stay and so information about them is scanty, but FAWO has already contacted LFMC Distribution in connection with hiring films for a Film Festival in Johannesburg. I also heard that a man who is involved in the Free Film-makers Co-op is currently working on film projects with kids in Alexandra Township.

I hope by the next edition of the LFMC's newsletter I'll have more to report.

MATTER OF FILIGREE (1980)
MATTER OF CLARITY (1985)
AN ARCHITECTURE OF DESIRE (1988)

WEDNESDAY 22nd MAY at 7.30pm

By the end of last summer the courses were obviously doing well and were very popular with new and potential members. The executive at that time felt the courses did indeed have a valid and vital role to play in the development of the co-op, and I was encouraged to explore the wider possibilities of access that the courses could offer. This led to the Birkbeck series of Critical Theory lectures and a seminar on funding, integrating the activities of distribution and cinema into courses.

By the end of the financial year 1990/91 the courses had made a profit.

In the light of the courses self-financing basis the present executive decided to have the courses finances transferred into the LFMC main books following the advice of Sandy, our administrator. It was also decided to formally ratify the post of courses administrator on a three-year tenure naming me as first person in post and asked me to prepare my own job description. This decision followed several votes of confidence at the general meeting.

The Building Situation

Summary by Sandy Welland from the administrative report to the executive meeting 9th May 1991.

Four possible buildings are being considered: at Dagmar Terrace, in Portobello Road, and two in Camden. The potential building will be bought and refurbished by a Developer/Family Trust that RPM (our relocation consultants) have found. The BFI will then lease the building from the developer, and have committed £30,000 for possible rent for the LFMC and LVA. The BFI will also have some office space in any building to house their new Film and Video Development Agency which will be formed in the autumn.

The Weber Douglas Theatre Academy has pulled out of the Dagmar Terrace option, however the developer/trust may still purchase the site and find other tenants himself. Both the Portobello building and the Dagmar Terrace have other parties interested in acquiring them. The developer and the BFI seem want to move fast on this, particularly now that the BFI want a home for their FVDA, and I am cautious confident that we will move by the end of 1991.

Is it age - or is it the impending closure of a century? I don't know, but one thing is certain: TIME is imprinted on the horizon in big letters. Transfixed, like a rabbit caught by lights of a passing car on a dark road, I stare at it.

The way we think about time is an expression of how we feel about our space in the world. Are we positioned in a linear time concept; one straight line with a beginning and an end. Birth and death. Time perceived almost as a solid thing moving along the line.

American script-writing manuals all stipulate: establish your goal as soon as possible. Hook your audience into the quest of the Holy Grail. Trapped inside a web of goal-directed intentions; we have all ridden on the horse and enjoyed it. Mainstream cinema.

But we do different things at the Co-op, don't we? Co-op members, where is time in your practice? Has it gone underground, hiding in a burrow with no eyes, in a subconscious existence, or is it roaming the surface? How can we convey the past in our films except for in flash-backs?

Maya Deren's view on poetry in film is worth considering. Film, she says, usually run along a horizontal axis, a development of events happening chronologically. One thing leads to another; cause and effect of everyday life. But when this unravelling of events is halted, and the moment investigated, a vertical structure is created - which is poetry. Time is stopped and space given dominance.

Space and time is the life-blood of a film.

In modern physics space and time cannot be separated. We can only understand time by measuring the distance between objects in space. If we have no objects or space, time ceases to exist.

But time itself is not simple time, it is also a manifestation of our culture, mental tools we use in order to orientate ourselves in the world; it is not necessarily an objective notion.

Consider these views:

Cyclical time: where everything repeats itself. Hundertwasser.

Backward time: looking at objects in space. Astronomers always look at the object's past because of the time it takes for light to travel. Looking at galaxies that existed millions of years ago.

The Western time concept is based on the material world. We only believe in matter. And because we see the time-span of living things in the world is limited, we can see no further than the end. The fatality of this view becomes unbearable so death is made taboo. The fear of the end; this is what drives mainstream goal-oriented cinema. Will the heroine/hero make it or not? We become chained to linear life full of causality.

One would think that this places us in the present, the here and now, but it is not so. The present eludes us because we are too busy peeping into the future or looking over our shoulders at the past. Yet both past and future are fictionalised; the past we have already censored, suppressed the uncomfortable into oblivion, and the future is a projection of unfulfilled needs.

It is not a question of being more in one tense or the other, but rather trying to step out of time altogether. To recondition the way we think about time, to have a simultaneous view of past/present/future. If it is at all possible.

And the question remains; how to translate this into film? Any thoughts or suggestions on this subject? The next newsletter will print your contribution however small.

The editors want the newsletter to be a place for shared ideas, methods and theories from film-makers about projects in progress. Take the word, if you dare!

This edition's contribution is from John Cant

I suspect I'm the oldest workshop member, well past retirement age, and I sometimes wonder if it's absurd of me to get involved in film-making. However, for what it's worth, here's what I've been up to:

I've been trying to put some of the work of Guy de Maupassant on to the screen. This French Short Story writer died at the age of 42 nearly 100 years ago, but his work is still to be found in any book shop in France and on any paper-back stall. His view of life was decidedly down to earth, often cynical, but he hated war and was aware of social injustice.

I showed one film at an open screening concerning a man-about-town who picks up a girl in a cemetery; it deals with a practice common in Parisian cemeteries at the time.

Among his obsessions were death, insanity and the supernatural. I am currently working on another graveyard theme; a man in a sort of nightmare sees the dead arise to deface their own tombstones. I've not yet decided how to tackle this. Any ideas out there?
